Indian Removal Act of 1830

Settlers moving to the Southeastern U.S. wanted land that belonged to the Indians. The U.S. federal and state governments saw the Indians as a problem and the settlers wanted the Indian's land to farm on.

So in 1830, U.S. Congress passed and Andrew Jackson signed the Indian Removal Act. This act ordered the removal of American Indians in the Southeast. The U.S. government called this area Indian Territory.

The Indian Removal Act first affected the Choctaw, Chickasaw, Creek and Seminole.

However, many of the tribes including the Cherokee refused to leave their homelands.

The Indians tried to keep their lands, but the U.S. government through treaties and warfare took their lands.

The journey from the Southeastern U.S. to Indian Territory in the west was a long and difficult journey.

Over 4,000 Cherokee died on the journey and the Cherokee named it "the trail where we cried", which became known as the Trail of Tears.
